In the first years of the 20th century, Madeline traveled the road between Chicago and the family farm in western Michigan. The road was called Michigan Avenue and it went from the bustling city on Lake Michigan to the shores of western Michigan - across the Great Lake. The area Madeline lived in was called Grant Park near Chicago, at first she traveled by horses pulling buggies, but soon the automobile was the way to travel. The road went through town after town. It was the main thoroughfare and the business center of each village. In many villages she would stop to shop at the general store to buy cloth - her favorite extravagance. She had cabinets full of favorite purchases along with older pieces she collected from cousins, aunts and grandmothers. Every piece of cloth reminded her of the summer trips along the great road and every piece of cloth was made into her wardrobe - and her special quilts.
